Adhika Mishra from Ambika Institute of Management and Technology, said, "The pandemic has been a good window for children as students to study and learn. Our education system is much regimented and children must be given the opportunity to study what interests them, learn things that cater to different mind-sets. This way the pandemic has given kids space to noble gesture, especially at a time when the pandemic presented some very unique challenges for teachers and educationists. Reorganizing and adapting to the changing needs of students and the global health crisis was unique and helped everyone learn key lessons. It has opened new vistas of education and helping everyone foray into new frontiers. I think The Times of India

Dr Sarabhi Modi Sahat from CLAT Possible, stated - "The event

The initiative to honour and award people from the field of education was much appreciated by one and all!

has been working in the best interest of the education industry. Looking at the way things have progressed in the world of academics since last year, technical education requires physical presence to build focus and understanding on practical and experiments that are pivotal to technical learnings. Labs are crucial and students must be encouraged to physically attend labs and practical sessions once the pandemic protocols ease while keeping online classes in practice."
Bhawna Gupta from Sir Padmapat Singhania

adigns of what we teach reflect the changes that are happening around us. For instance, the pandemic had a direct impact on students and teachers. It impacted not just the medium of learning but also how students were being assessed and what they were studying. I think The Times of India for recognizing the efforts academicians are making in building this nation."
Dhruv Galgatta, from Galgotia University, said "Real time adaptation to the changing needs in the time is what has helped the educationists continue the process of learning for students. It is important that policy makers, academicians and educationists work on value-based strategies for the future that make the process of teaching and learning more
